Qatar's Legal Framework of Migration*

Maysa Zahra

Abstract: Over the last decade, Qatar has significantly revised its legal framework in a number of areas that are relevant to the issue of migration. The revision has led to the establishment of rules and regulations that better conform to international standards in areas such as labour rights and human trafficking. However, Qatar's controversial kefala (sponsorship) system is still a source of concern. This note offers researchers a succinct outline and summary of Qatar's legal framework on migration. The system of migration-related legislation in the State of Qatar includes the Constitution, international treaties concluded, national laws and by-laws.

Keywords: Qatar; Laws and Regulations; Irregularity; Migration; Citizenship; Trafficking; Sponsorship; Labour Rights.

The Permanent Constitution of Qatar was enacted in 2004 and replaced the constitution that had been in effect since the country's declaration of independence. In 2009, Qatar adopted a new law regulating the entry, exit, residence, and sponsorship of expatriates. Under this law, expatriates still require the sponsorship of a Qatari national (typically their employer). They must work for their employer for at least two years before they are allowed to find a new employer and transfer their sponsorship after obtaining a clearance letter from their sponsor. The sponsor also has control over whether or not his/ her expatriate employee obtains an exit visa and whether or not they are banned from the country for two years.

* This is a revised and updated version of the "Qatar's Legal Framework of Migration," Explanatory Note No. 2/2013, available here: <http://cadmus.eui.eu/handle/1814/32154>.

In 2015, Qatar repealed this law and enacted a new one, which it claimed would introduce significant changes to the sponsorship system. In reality, it did little more than change the terms used for “sponsor” and “sponsorship,” replacing them with “recruiter” and “responsibility,” respectively. Under this law, the employer can still exercise control over the exit of the foreign employee from the country. The foreign employee may submit a petition to the exit petitions committee to contest the decision of the employer or the competent authority prohibiting him from exiting the country. The transfer of employment is still subject to the approval of both the employer and the Ministry of Labour.^{1}

As recently as 2011, a new law on combating trafficking in persons that prohibits all forms of trafficking and prescribes sufficiently stringent penalties, as well as improved identification of trafficking victims, was adopted. The crime of trafficking in human beings is broadly defined to include activities within the state territory and across its national borders and a wide range of forms of exploitation.

Law No. 14 of 2004 (Labour Law) sets minimum standards for employment in areas such as working hours, vacations and public holidays, health and safety, and termination of employment. Employees excluded from the application of the Labor Law include domestic workers, casual workers, and working members of the employer’s family.

An amendment was introduced to the Labour Law in 2015, requiring employers to transfer salaries directly from their local Qatari accounts into a Qatari account in the name of the employee. In the same vein, Qatar enacted a new regulation introducing a wage protection system applicable to employees who are subject to the Labour Law. Employers are required to transfer salaries to the bank accounts of employees within seven days of their due date or face penalties.²

The new law promulgated in 2005 on Qatari nationality allows expatriates to apply for Qatari citizenship if they have resided in the country for a minimum of 25 years, have a clean criminal record, good knowledge of the Arabic language, and make a good living. Under the new law, Qatari women may sponsor their foreign spouse and children if they meet certain conditions but they may not transmit Qatari nationality to them.
